

John Milton: Political Thinker Statesman; An Address Delivered to an Assembly of Free Churchmen, at Cambridge, December 9th, 1908 (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from John Milton: Political Thinker Statesman; An Address Delivered to an Assembly of Free Churchmen, at Cambridge, December 9th, 1908

The time and thoughts of each passing generation of mankind are, for the most part, taken up about present things. Few, of any generation, have become acquainted with the past, and some of these have been indebted, for their information and opinions, to the studies and enquiries of others. Few have made any independent researches of their own. Of the Commonwealth, and the writings of Milton, few to-day have any knowledge. Fewer still have any knowledge of the Prose writings of Milton. Those who, in the past, have become acquainted with them, have not desired to promote their study, because a familiarity with them would tend to destroy many shameful institutions, which those, who have read the Prose writings of Milton, were deeply desirous to maintain. The utmost efforts have been made to prevent their study, and for many years after the Restoration, the volumes, that contained them, were committed to the flames. With the exception of Mr. Masson, and one or two more of Milton's biographers, scarcely any biographer or critic makes any commendatory reference to the Prose writings of Milton, and whilst the utmost praise is bestowed upon Milton as a poet, and he is, in respect of his poetry, bowed into immortality, his Prose writings have been greatly and unjustly disparaged.
